THE CHRISTIE

1911 CHRISTIE-AMERICAN STEAM FIRE ENGINE

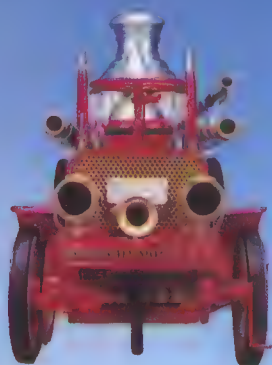

68 YEARS AGO THIS WAS THE FIRE
ENGINE OF THE FUTURE.

In 1911, an inventor named John Christie talked the San Francisco Fire Department into hooking up one of their normally horse-drawn steam pumpers to one of his internal combustion front-wheel-drive tractors. While not the first attempt at this conversion, THE CHRISTIE was the first successful combination. THE CHRISTIE motorized fire engine was applauded as the biggest boon to firefighting since water. Racing to a fire at a breath-taking 18 miles-per-hour, breathing smoke and fire from its boiler, and with the noisy clanking of its alarm bell and unmuffled furor of its mighty 4-cylinder engine, THE CHRISTIE was the cause of heart-stopping excitement at the turn of the century.

Now, MPC has added THE CHRISTIE to its Master Piece Collection of museum quality reproductions. Built to exacting 1/12 scale, the 18-inch long model is made up from almost 400 highly detailed parts. Molded in full color in red, black, and gray, with many simulated brass and chrome plated parts, plus colorful striping decals, THE CHRISTIE makes a brilliant display for the adult modeler.

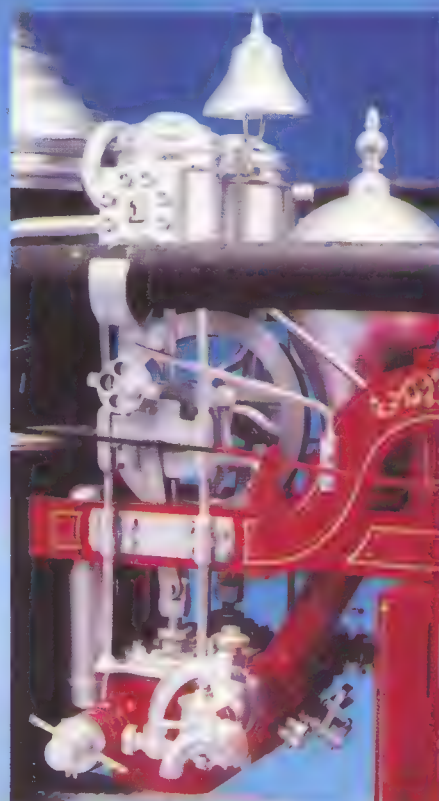

Completely detailed from its tall boiler stack, and pump mechanism, to its opening hood with complete engine, drive-train and working steering, THE CHRISTIE has been designed from the actual engine. Marking decals are included for the San Francisco Fire Department, as well as the prototype markings from Mountain View, New Jersey.

THE CHRISTIE even includes its own display stand with cobblestone road bed, and a builder's signature plate.
